UU office location changes met with dissatisfaction

By Cass Caulfield
Staff Writer

Not all groups are pleased with the location changes in the University Union proposed in the annual space allocation and review report (SAR).

The ASI Program Board voiced its dissatisfaction about the business office vacates the space.

The Program Board asked the student Board of Directors to consider three options regarding approval of the SAR report: First, to table the report until a later date; second, to give Program Board both 202A and 202C; and third, to give the Program Board the Foundation cashiers office, which will be vacated in the future, said Pat McGuire, Program Board chairman.

The Operations Committee of the Union Executive Committee has been working on the SAR for most of this year — when a final plan was finally proposed, all groups involved agreed that the spaces allocated to them would work, said Don Hofer, chair of the UEC's operations committee.

Hofer also said that the place to handle this situation was at the committee level and not at the Board of Directors.

"It's been difficult to figure out really what Program Board has wanted ... their opinion and needs changed from time to time," said Hofer.

Hofer also said he thought there was miscommunication between the Program Board representative at the UEC meetings and the Program Board itself.

Concern was also expressed in UEC and the Board of Directors that DSS is a state-funded program and it is using space in a university student union.

— Dan Hofer

In the report an amendment is attached stating that a lease agreement be drawn up with the state regarding the state space in the UU.

Other state-funded groups that have space in the UU are the photo I.D. service and the Multi-Cultural Center, Hofer said.

Jeff Smith, director from the School of Professional Studies and Education, moved to amend the motion to approve the report, excluding the resolution regarding the Program Board's location. The amendment failed 8-10.

Finally, an amendment was attached to the report asking that the Operations Committee, management and Program Board work together to resolve their differences.

The Board of Directors approved the space allocation and review report.

"We are really encouraging Program Board to work with my committee and the management in building to resolve the issue," Hofer said.

space that was allotted to it in the UU 202 office complex at the ASI Board of Directors meeting Wednesday.

"202A alone is not an adequate space for Program Board," said Jonathan McNaul, Program Board's vice chair.

The space allocation and review report calls for location changes and renovations in the University Union in order to deal with critical space problems.

Program Board, Disabled Student Services and Recreational Sports will share the 202 office complex as soon as the ASI

Campus group to try cold fusion venture

A Cal Poly professor will lead a group of students in an attempt to recreate the controversial cold fusion experiment that has gripped the scientific community since its announcement last March.

Tomlinson Fort, professor of metallurgy and chemistry, said by as early as next week he and his students could have a preliminary check of their findings completed. He warned, however, that the experiment will proceed with caution.

"We don't want to attempt anything until we understand what we are doing," he said.

Fort explained that the experiment creators, Dr. Stanely Pons and Dr. Martin Fleischman from the University of Southampton, have not released all of the details of the project.

"I believe they held back the information to protect their patent rights," he said. "Understand, their findings, if substantiated, could literally change the way we live. It would eliminate smog in Los Angeles for instance."

Fort will be assisted in the experiment by a group of four students: metallurgy and materials major Mark Richards; chemistry majors Dwayne Bell and Dave Sheesley; and physics major Af-

'Model' students work math problem for award

By Mark Ahlemeyer
Staff Writer

Cal Poly math students showed they are just as good as students from schools like Cal Tech and Washington University, after being awarded the highest honor this week at an annual meeting of a national science organization in Vancouver, British Columbia.

The awards were a result of nearly 96 hours of work by two Cal Poly teams on a single math modeling problem.

"A lot of people don't know what math modeling is," said team member Michael Kelleher. "Math modeling is taking any real-life phenomena and making a mathematical description out of it."

"For example, say you have two people in a spitfight. They're obviously going to move around a lot to get the right angle to spit at. With math modeling you try to find the optimum angle possible."

In the end, team members Kelleher, Scott Guth and Scott Langfeldt received a meritorious outstanding award for their model while the team of members Jay Austin, Walt Clark and Craig Nelson received a meritorious award.

There were four categories of awards for the contest sponsored by the Operations Research Society of America. In descending order, they were: meritorious; honorable mention; successful participation; and unsuccessful participation.

This year there were 17 meritorious teams and prefix of "outstanding" was added to only three papers. Cal Poly secured one of them. Cal Tech and Washington University were awarded the other two. All "outstanding" papers are published in the Undergraduate Mathematics Applications Project Journal. This year's team is the first from Cal Poly to be published.

"Over 300 teams started (this year's contest)," said Thomas O'Neil, team coordinator and math professor, and 212 solutions were submitted from 143 different schools.

The contest began in mid-February when packets were mailed to universities nationwide, including Harvard and MIT. Each of the packets contained two problems, one of which the team chooses to do.

Date rape is hidden in 'beautiful' SLO

By David J. Carlson

A young 18-year-old girl comes to Cal Poly. San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town. Yes, this is by far one of the safest environments for a young adult to come of age in. Her parents bring her up to this town from an upper-middle-class suburban city in Orange County. While she was aware of the rampant crime of urban Los Angeles, she still lived a very sheltered life in her parents' two-story tract house only a short drive from the beach. What a wonderful life she has had.

She and her parents had visited several universities: UCLA, San Diego State, Berkeley. She spent hours going over the catalogs of each of the campuses. Her parents were beginning to get concerned as they visited one college after another. Mom and dad were beginning to realize that they had perhaps given their daughter too much. Everything had been handed to her on a silver platter, and the harsh reality of the world was a foreign concept to her. They couldn't possibly send their baby to one of these places. What a culture shock for their girl.

One day, her father was told about this wonderful place just up the coast a couple hundred miles. He was told of clean air, proximity to a beach, no traffic and a highly regarded university. So they decided to make the trek up to San Luis Obispo and fell in love with it as soon as they got there. They found nothing wrong with the town. San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town.

So the little girl applied to Cal Poly and, low and behold, her grades and SAT scores were so high she was easily accepted. September rolled around and the threesome made the journey up to the quiet little community for Cal Poly's own Week of Welcome. There were some orientation meetings about keeping belongings safe from theft and alcohol abuse and this thing called acquaintance rape.

"Well, sure those things happen at those other schools we looked at," her father reasoned, "But that's why we came here ... to get away from such crime." Her mother agreed, "San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town."

So the parents left after the weekend, wishing their daughter the best and planning a big party for her visit in three weeks. As they drove along Highway 101, they talked about how wonderful Cal Poly is and what a wonderful choice it was. San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town.

School started up and the little girl did well. She met a boy in her freshman comp class. He was a junior, but he had just decided to take the class. The class went well, and the couple began going out. Study sessions at Farm Boy and a couple of movies at the Fremont. Things went just wonderfully. San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town.

One evening, the two planned to study most of the night for a midterm the next day. She told her roommate that she'd be at his apartment if someone needed to get hold of her but she would be back around midnight. She left with her backpack on her shoulder and a smile on her face. San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town.

The studies went well. In fact, they finished earlier than they expected, so they watched some TV. As they sat on the sofa, they began to kiss. They felt so good in each other's arms, holding each other. Soon it began to get a little too intimate for the girl. She told him to stop, but he wouldn't listen. Initially, he thought she was kidding, but soon she was struggling to get away. This was a completely different person than the one she knew. Hair was pulled out and clothing was torn as he shoved a sock in her mouth to keep her quiet. The pristine little girl was growing up in the most degrading, sickening way.

Early the next morning, her roommate took her to the Health Center. Her hair had been ripped out from the roots in places. A tooth was broken. She had scratches and bruises up and down her legs.

The walls of her vagina were torn and bloodied by the force of his hands. She could barely walk, so a wheelchair was brought for her. Yes, San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town.

Acquaintance rape is not a recently discovered crime. It has been going on for a long time. It is just now finally beginning to be treated with the concern it deserves. One might ask if it is just now starting to be reported by victims. No, it hasn't. There have been upwards of 14 reported cases since September. There were several that were reported during Poly Royal. There is even one that is in court right now. But we see nothing regarding this in the press. Why haven't we heard about this, you ask? I ask too ... why?

I do not wish to sound like a fanatic on the fringes of society, but the cold, hard fact of it is that

As they sat on the sofa, they began to kiss. They felt so good in each other's arms. Soon it began to get a little too intimate for the girl. She told him to stop, but he wouldn't listen. the powers that be, whether they be the administration of this university or the city itself may be actively attempting to hush up these crimes. We have been led to believe that this is a clean, wholesome community, when in reality, violent crimes are being committed at an epidemic rate. I am not trying to unnecessarily frighten the public. I am trying to get the public to ask the question of who is silencing the facts and why.

Who is to benefit if there really is a cover up of the facts? The university keeps its clean image and a very high application rate. It also benefits from a huge turnout to Poly Royal. Money does talk. The city gets much higher revenues from the continued high tourist rate, and it also maintains its sparkling image.

So then who loses? The young girl from her suburban home who was led to believe by the administration and the city that San Luis Obispo is a completely safe environment, and walking the streets at night is nothing to fear. I put it to the people in charge: How can you put your image and your pocketbook before the welfare of the students of this university? The university is here to educate the students. Education must go beyond the classroom and into our homes. Orientation meetings during Week of Welcome do little good when the facts about our campus are being held back. The facts of acquaintance rape must not be silenced solely to help promote the image of Cal Poly. How many girls need to be raped before those in power recognize that there is a serious problem here? How many more innocent young girls like the one from Orange County need to be senselessly attacked simply because some bureaucracy wishes to protect itself. Does a girl need to be killed before we allow the facts to be printed? We, as students, residents and potential victims, have the right to know the facts. We cannot allow ourselves to hold the naive perception that rapes do not occur here because ... San Luis Obispo is such a beautiful town.

Diners spend night turkey trotting

Editor — Did you eat Sunday Brunch at the Stalls? Have the Turkey A La King (You know: peas, gravy, turkey cubes — next to the rice?)? Didja forego sleep Sunday night?

If you answered "yes" to these questions, and experienced hideously disgusting symptoms too embarrassing to print, you probably came down with something both the Health Center and the Stalls uncomfortably refer to as "Confidential Information."

Thanks, guys, for showing us how much you care. It's nice to know that you people are so concerned about our welfare that you put our bodies before the administration hardline.

We don't care if it looks good. Heck, we don't even care if it tastes good. But we don't want to pay $568 a quarter for "food" with side effects.

In the future, let's leave Night Moves to Rec Sports.

Student priority takes 'flying leap'

Editor — It is almost time to register for summer classes. For me, the long awaited time had come; I had first priority for continuing students. Imagine my horror when I opened the summer class schedule to find that for some bizarre reason students attending summer don't get "CAPTURED" in order of their registration priority. It seems that I get to share my long-awaited first priority status with those who are fourth priority. Those who are second and third priority register the next day, after the fourth priority students. Who comes next? Eighth priority, of course. By giving students "priority" in registration, everyone is supposed to get a fair chance at getting those seemingly "unCAPTUREable" general education classes. However, with the new Warren Baker Numbering System (1,4,2,3,5,8,6,7,9), our equal opportunity to be "CAPTURED" takes the proverbial "flying leap." I would like to suggest that those who devised this system do the same.

A call for Shell to leave S. Africa

Editor — "An oil spill threatens wild life on Alaska's South Central Coast," the headlines read March 24. Exxon's efforts to clean up are now being discredited by environmentalists. Politicians say a boycott of Exxon products may be in order.

At this time Shell Oil has one of the largest oil refineries in South Africa, fueling an economy that thrives on the exploitation of a people. I ask, "Is this less of an evil than an accidental oil spill?" The next time you pass a Shell station, think of the people that are fighting for freedom and slain children and ask yourself which company is most worthy of chastisement. At this present time there is a Shell boycott to divest in South Africa.

New CFA chief plans for growth

By Laura Daniels
Staff Writer

The California Faculty Association's president-elect told a group at Cal Poly Tuesday that he values CFA because it provides protection from an outside world that does not believe in higher education.

Patrick Nicholson, professor and chair of religious studies at Cal State Northridge, will begin his two-year term of office June 1. He was on campus for a CFA presentation honoring Cal Poly authors.

During his first year in office, Nicholson plans to expand membership, start an aggressive campaign for quality education and enhance communication between the CFA and CSU faculty.

"We must see an increased membership over the next two years," said Nicholson. He estimates present CFA membership to be more than 50 percent for tenured faculty, and he wants the number to reach 70 percent.

"We've also been very successful in recruiting new faculty," Nicholson said, adding CFA helps new faculty members in the review process and in negotiating contracts and salaries on their behalf.

The faculty should join CFA not only to support their profession with material contributions, "but also, adding to the actual numbers gives (CFA) strength," Nicholson said. This strength will improve CFA's bargaining position, he added.

Nicholson said the CSU Chancellor's Office knows when CFA's membership numbers change.

"They know when we are strong. I want CFA to be ready and enthusiastic for bargaining in 1991."

A campaign for quality education, said Nicholson, will help boost the moral of CSU faculty.

"We have to sell the story of the CSU to the legislature, community groups, (and) parent groups."

Nicholson said because of the traditional second-tier status of the CSU (in comparison with the UC system), people are unaware of how vital the CSU system is. Nicholson said he believes this to be the fault of the CSU Chancellor's Office.

"I just feel that they (the Chancellor's Office) don't represent us. Everyone knows who the president of the UC is; no one knows who the Chancellor is," he said.

It is CFA's job to inform the public, said Nicholson, since the Chancellor's Office has not done so. Through radio spots and contacting other unions, Nicholson hopes to let people know that the CSU system is first-rate.

"I am devoted to CFA because it is a means for protecting and expressing values I cherish as a teacher and student: inquiry, competence, democratic process, diversity of personalities and freedom to be our unique, eccentric selves as we act collectively," he said.

25 arrested at Fresno St. sit-in

FRESNO, Calif. (AP) — A two-day student sit-in involving a political dispute between two factions ended Wednesday night with 25 arrests at an office at Fresno State University Wednesday afternoon.

Members of a liberal campus political party called United Students for Responsible Government began the sit-in after 3 p.m. Tuesday in the office of the Student Senate, disrupting a scheduled meeting on controversial bylaw changes.

But university police began to make arrests at 8 p.m. Wednesday, citing the students for unlawful assembly and for disrupting school activities on a campus, said Officer Brad Wordle.

Wordle said the office was cleared of all protesters.

Those arrested reportedly were released after being issued citations.

In the protest, the liberals accused the current conservative student administration of sexism and racism for proposing changes the liberals said would dilute power of the two top elective positions which will be held next year by women, one of them Hispanic.

The current student body president, Scott Vick, vetoed the changes, but the liberals feared the Student Senate would override their veto. Vick was one of four officers whose resignations the protesters demanded.

An estimated 15 students remained in the Student Senate office overnight Tuesday even though the university's president, Harold Haak, had told them he would use his authority to reject the amendments if the Student Senate overrode the veto.

the problems until the Friday of the week you receive them," said Kelleher. "You can open the packets up at 12 a.m. Friday if you want, but not before."

"We chose to wait until a decent hour in the morning before looking at them, just so we could get some rest. You then have until the following Monday to solve the problem and get it postmarked. So we had about 96 hours to solve the problem."

Participants in this year's contest had a choice of creating a model for an airport or classifying a species of insect.

"Both teams liked the second question better, so we did it instead," said Kelleher.

"In the second question you have two populations of a species of bug known as a 'midge,' he said. "The populations and types are very hard to tell apart. Some scientists put together tables of data for wing and antennae lengths. Using the data from that table, we had to categorize which species it came from. They told us which species they were, that's how we knew to categorize them. The table classified the bugs. There were just three unknowns that we had to figure out."

Cal Poly has a good history in the five years of this contest, said O'Neil. "The first year (we entered), we had meritorious and honorable mention. The second year we got meritorious and successful participation. It's tough to even get even a successful participation."

"It takes a lot of stamina and perseverance just to turn something in," said O'Neil. "And to do as well as they have takes a lot of preliminary work on their part.

"(These teams) were just remarkable. And this isn't a math school at all. It just goes to show that we have the talent here on campus. It's just a matter of ferreting it out."

The teams for the competition were chosen through MATH 371, the math modeling class on campus.

Hotel guests get loud wake-up call

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Guests at the Hyatt Wilshire Hotel got an unusual wake-up call when about 50 hotel employees blew horns and whistles to protest lingering contract negotiations.

The employees, who staged their protest at 6:30 a.m. Wednesday, want a raise from $5 an hour to $5.75 an hour and overtime pay for working more than five days a week, said Miguel Contreras, director of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees International Union.

Contreras said Hyatt wants employees to work 10 consecutive days without overtime pay.

The union, which represents maids, dishwashers and cooks, has been unsuccessful in reaching an agreement during the past three weeks with Hyatt management.

"We figure if the Hyatt doesn't listen to us, maybe they will listen to their guests who can't get a decent night's sleep," Contreras said.

Hyatt spokeswoman Therese Tomlinson said the two sides have made "substantial progress" during negotiations.

Meanwhile, guests said they weren't offended by the protest.

"It sounds like New York to me," said one visitor as she walked past the shouting demonstrators to a downtown cafe for breakfast.

FUSION

 shin Abedi.

"The students are really doing the work," Fort said. "They are scrounging the materials we'll need from various parts of the campus, as well as helping on the technical side."

Fort said the materials and specifically the money to acquire them will be the first obstacle in their effort.

"Cal Poly doesn't have the money of a Cal Tech or Stanford," he said. "What we do have is committed personnel."

Fort initially became interested in the subject when he attended a physics conference in Dallas where Dr. Pons spoke about his experiment.

"I got excited about the possibilities of trying the experiment here at Poly, but I admit I was a bit skeptical," he said. "It almost sounded too simple."

Upon returning, Fort discussed the idea of room temperature fusion with fellow physics and chemistry professors which fueled his excitement.

"I already had a piece of palladium (one of the two metals needed for the experiment) and I discovered we have heavy water on campus," he said.

Heavy water is composed of deuterium and oxygen (D2O), as opposed to oxygen and hydrogen (H2O).

In fusion, two atoms of deuterium join to form one atom of helium, a neutron and extra energy in the form of heat.

"If we can detect that the heat is being emitted from a chemical reaction then our experiment will have been successful," Fort said.

Adoption creates mix of special families

Kuuipo Burleigh thought her family was like any other. They shared the usual good times and sibling rivalries.

Yet as she grew older, Kuuipo realized that people thought her family was different.

Kuuipo is the oldest of five children. Three are the biological children of a Chinese-Hawaiian mother and Caucasian father, and two are adopted. Her brother Kimo is a black-Vietnamese, and her sister Kainoa is a black-Korean. Kuuipo said her family was the subject of many double-takes.

"We'd go places and people would stare," she said.

Her brother Kimo said when the family moved to Colorado, the children at the new school would not believe he and his oldest brother were actually from the same family.

"People wouldn't believe that we were brothers," he said.

Martin Kellerman, a Cal Poly chemistry professor, had a similar experience. He and his wife adopted two black children. When his daughter was three years old, she got lost in Sears. An elderly couple tried to help her find her father, but they looked right past the white-skinned Kellerman as he approached.

However, Kellerman said despite the difference in skin color, it is easy to forget his children are adopted. Once his wife told someone that both she and her daughter are left-handed. They theorized that it may be hereditary — then they thought again and laughed.

Kellerman said they never thought twice about having a racially-mixed family.

"It wasn't something I planned. I hadn't thought about it," but, he said, "I wouldn't trade it for anything."

Michael Ahler, a technician for the chemistry department, and his wife Lanny, a substitute teacher, said they also don't think of their children as adopted.

"I don't think of our kids as, these are adopted," Michael Ahler said, "These are our kids."

The Ahlers have adopted four children: Bryce, now 14, who is part Japanese, Leia, 11, who is Caucasian, and Kameron, 4, and Ethan, 1, who are both Korean. The Ahlers also run Open Homes Open Hearts, a support group for people who adopt children from overseas.

When the Ahlers first wanted to adopt in 1974, it was very hard to get infants. So they applied to adopt children from South and Central America. Then the local government agency came through with Bryce and Leia, and the Ahlers had to turn down the children from overseas.

Later, they grew more interested in pursuing their original path, especially when the local government agency began to stall them. They heard adopting children from Korea was faster, so they tried it and got both Kameron and Ethan.

Michael Ahler said they try and introduce the children to their own culture. A kite from Korea and fan from Japan hang on the walls. Kameron and Ethan have Han Boks, traditional Korean costumes, and Bryce has a set of Japanese fish kites. Both Kameron and Ethan had Korean names when they arrived. The Ahlers retained these as their middle names. Their full names are Kameron Seong-cheol Ahler and Ethan Kyung-ho Ahler.

Adopting their children from overseas

has caused one problem for the Ahlers: Kameron now believes that babies come from airplanes. Lanny Ahler said they will explain to Kameron that a person is not adopted and he will say, "Yeah, but what plane did you come on."

Kimo Burleigh remembers coming to the United States. He was three years old and spoke only Vietnamese when he left the orphanage in Vietnam. He arrived, he said, "pot-bellied and afraid of everything."

Kuuipo was 7 years old when Kimo arrived. She said he was very polite, ate everything on his plate and had perfect table manners at his young age.

"He didn't know any English at all," she said. The other children would point at things and get him to repeat the English words.

Kimo had other problems adjusting to the United States.

"He wouldn't sleep on a bed," Kuuipo said. "He had to sleep on the floor." She supposed he slept on the floor in the orphanage. Even after he slept in a bed, Kuuipo said he would fall out every night.

Dean of the School of Science and Mathematics Philip S. Bailey and his wife, Christina Bailey of the chemistry department, know how hard it is to adopt a child at that age. They have adopted four children, three blacks and one Hispanic. Their last child was 2 1/2 when they adopted him.

"It was a surprise to us," Philip Bailey said, "You don't get instant love from kids."

He said bonding is easier with a baby, which is more dependent on the parents. He said it took a couple of years before he felt a father-child bonding with his youngest son.

Philip Bailey admitted that it was a novelty having a black baby at first, but "after you change a couple of diapers and it throws up on you ... it doesn't matter what color they are."

The Baileys said when they were first adopting children, there were many babies available. They said some prospective parents would even specify the color eyes and hair they wanted in a baby. People wanted a baby that looked like them. The Baileys, however, just wanted children.

They don't think any problems have developed because of their interracial family. They said they never thought it would be different from raising their own children; they didn't expect anything to be different.

In fact, they also forget that their children are adopted, and so does the community.

"Occasionally someone will say, 'I keep forgetting,'" Philip Bailey said.

The Baileys believe their children are essentially "white middle class," because they have been raised that way.

However, they encourage their children to study black leaders and movements for school projects.

Philip Bailey said he has never seen any racial discrimination against his children.

Kellerman said his family has never had any problems in the San Luis Obispo area either.

The Ahlers believe that most people who stare are just curious. Most often they said people will mention that they are also adopted or they know another family that has adopted children of other races. They think it creates a common bond more than anything.

"They're just ... kids," Bailey said. Kellerman agrees.

"Our kids have enriched our lives and we're glad we did it," he said, "even if they are a pain."

Rugby closes out season

By Scott Green
Special to the Daily

Last weekend the Cal Poly rugby team completed their season in Monterey at the Pebble Beach Rugby Classic.

The Cal Poly team won two of five matches to finish 14th.

In the Mustang's first match of the weekend, Ian Hunter led the team past the San Jose Westies 9-6. Cal Poly then faced the formidable Public School Wanderers, an all-star team from the British Isles. The Wanderers were too much for the Mustangs as they took the game 23-0.

Mustang Nick Massman said of the game against the Wanderers, "They schooled us."

Cal Poly then lost to the Bay Area Touring Side 10-4. The Mustangs recorded their second win by beating the Oxy Old Boys, an alumni team from Occidental College, 7-4.

Sunday, the ruggers lost to former national champions Old Mission Bay Athletic Club 18-3.

Tennis team heads to nationals

Number-two singles player Brendan Walsh in an early season match. Walsh and the rest of the tennis team leave for Lake of the Ozarks today to begin competition in the Division II national championships.

The Cal Poly men's tennis team leaves today to compete in the Division II nationals at Lake of the Ozarks, Missouri. The Mustangs, ranked second in the nation, will take on teams such as the number-one seeded Hampton University of Virginia, and Rollins College of Florida.

Though tennis is often seen as an individual competition, the team has thrived this season on team unity and good coaching. Brendan Walsh, a history senior and Poly's number-two singles player explained, "We play as a team. No one gets singled out to pull the weight."

The team will compete in five singles and three doubles matches. Tim Fresenius, Walsh, Alex Havrileiko, Eric Sasoa and Max Allman will fill the singles spots with Peter Killian serving as the alternate. The doubles teams are Fresenius and Havrileiko (ranked first in the nation), Walsh and Killian, See TENNIS, page 7

Softball begins regionals

By Michael J. Levy
Staff Writer

After using the Sacramento State Tournament last weekend as a tuneup, the Lady Mustangs begin playoff action Saturday in the CCAA regionals at Cal State Northridge.

The Mustangs will open the double-elimination tournament against Cal State Bakersfield, while Northridge will follow with a game against Cal State Dominguez Hills. The two winners will then play each other in the winners bracket. But because it is double-elimination, a team can lose the first game, and can still win the tournament by winning three straight. The winner of the regional then advances to the national tournament at Sacramento State beginning on May 20.

The Lady Mustangs are 5-2 on the year against Bakersfield, including a 6-3 loss last weekend that left the Mustangs in a tie for third with tournament host Sacramento State. Overall, the Mustangs finished with a 31-14-1 record. They finished 14-5-1 in conference, coming in second behind Northridge.

As for the tournament as a whole, Boyer is optimistic of the Lady Mustangs chances if they play up to their capabilities.

"We need the same mental sharpness that we're capable of having. If mentally we stay sharp, there's no reason we shouldn't win regionals."

and Sasoa and Allman.

Coach Kevin Platt said the Poly team has been ranked second nationally all season. He is confident of their chances of defeating Hampton.

"They're not unbeatable," he said, "and we have a history of playing well."

Walsh said his biggest concern for matches against the top-seeded team will be the fact that Poly has never played Hampton.

Coach and team members agree that Poly's key attributes are the cohesiveness of the team and their attitudes.

"The team gets along great, and that ingredient overrides talent," Walsh said. "Everyone feels an obligation to their teammates."

When the team returns next week, Platt said their focus will be academic.

"Now that the season's over, hopefully the guys will study."

Graduates prepare for their day

Anticipation fills Grad Center line as students pay up

By Michael J. Levy
Staff Writer

The one line on campus that seniors probably won't mind waiting in is the one to pick up their caps and gowns.

They may not mind waiting, but paying for the necessary items is a different story. Some expressed exasperation at the prices as they left. The cap and gown is selling for $12, and there is a $10 commencement fee. A small diploma without a cover and a package of 10 announcements is included for free. More announcements are available for $5.99 per package.

And if seniors haven't already picked up their caps and gowns, they have until June 1 to get into the Grad Center, located at the back of the El Corral bookstore. The center is open the same hours as the bookstore, 7:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday, and Saturday's 10:30 to 4:30.

One student, while waiting at the Grad Center, was even planning what he had in store for June's graduation ceremony.

Todd D'Angelo, who has been concentrating in accounting while in the business department, wants to feel as if he's at Dodger Stadium during the ceremony. No, he doesn't plan to leave halfway through, which Dodger fans are notorious for doing. Rather, he wants to toss around a beach ball, well ... sort of.

"I was thinking about getting one of those blow-up dolls, and throw that around like they throw beach balls at Dodger Stadium," he said.

Others in line weren't planning to be so exuberant. A fellow accounting major, Mark Kornfiend, doesn't want to do anything that will make his parents squirm in their seats.

"I'm not planning anything out of the ordinary," he said. "My parents are going to be there and I don't want to embarrass them."

Gorbachev to visit China

Asked to speak at Beijing University

BEIJING (AP) — Leaders of China's pro-democracy student movement announced Thursday they would invite Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev to speak on political reform in his country when he arrives Monday.

Protest leaders also said they were planning their own "welcoming ceremony" for the Soviet president, who will be the first Soviet leader to visit China in 30 years.

"We have not ruled out a demonstration to express our support for political reform," said one activist, who has helped lead seven marches since mid-April for democracy and a free press.

On Thursday night, students collected 1,200 signatures on an open invitation to Gorbachev. Organizers said they hoped most of the university's more than 10,000 students would sign by Saturday, when the invitation will be delivered to the Soviet Embassy in Beijing.

A student leader said he did not believe the Kremlin leader would come to the university. Gorbachev's trip is expected to mark the normalization of Soviet-Chinese relations, strained since Beijing challenged Moscow's right to dominate the world communist movement three decades ago.

"We are doing this to express our interest in Gorbachev's reforms and to show our government that we support fundamental political reform in China," said the leader.

An Asian diplomat said Gorbachev had expressed interest in addressing the student body at Beijing University. But he said the Chinese government rejected the request and instead offered to allow the Soviet leader to walk through Tiananmen Square, shake hands and converse with passers-by.

"The Chinese are afraid that no matter what Gorbachev says he will feed the fires of the student movement," the diplomat said on condition of anonymity. "At this point in time, they are afraid of Gorbachev's reforms and of the effect any speech by him could have on the students."

Students have been demonstrating for democracy and a free press in Beijing and elsewhere following the death April 15 of ousted Communist Party chief Hu Yaobang, a favorite among intellectuals.

Students who have formed an independent association have also asked the government for dialogue and to recognize the organization as legal.

The government has called the organization illegal and said it would only conduct talks with the officially appointed student unions.

On Thursday, the government said it was still unable to answer the students' request regarding dialogue but would have a reply in one week, student leaders said.

At Beijing University, students said Thursday night they wanted Gorbachev to speak at their university because they were interested in the Soviet changes.
